Recent deaccessioning of artifacts, works of art or entire collections from a museum or gallery has sparked an increase in the critical debate among directors, curators, artists, lawyers, the courts, politicians and the public.

What factors contribute to “good” or “bad” deaccessioning? What are the legal, ethical, and professional standards? Do they vary for each institution, or each case? Deaccessioning is the permanent removal (by sale, gift, trade or even destruction) of collections items from museums, galleries, archives, libraries and similar institutions. Done properly, it is an important part of a comprehensive collections management program and strengthens the value of its collection. Done poorly, it can bring an institution negative publicity, discourage patronage, create financial problems and even lawsuits.

Many institutions within Canada are currently deaccessioning objects from their collections, or plan to do so in the near future. How they have mitigated the risks involved to ensure a successful divestment has not previously been shared. This symposium, sponsored by the Canadian Museums Association, will address the question, “must works donated or purchased by a museum or gallery be held as public trust forever or can they be sold or given away for a variety of justifications?” If revenues are achieved, how should this money be allocated? Until recently, artworks and objects were quietly sold to enhance the care and growth of a collection. It is more transparent and controversial when artworks are being put on the market to pay current operating costs, employee salaries and even pensions.
Through a mix of presentations, round tables, open forum discussions and networking opportunities, an extensive list of topics will be addressed.

ETHICAL STANDARDS
- How should you reach your decision?
- Should you try to find a local repository?
- Is a private sale acceptable?
- What role does mission play?
- What do donors of collections and funders think?
- How can you make the divestment press-friendly and communicate in a positive manner?

PROFESSIONAL STANDARDS
- What policies do relevant umbrella organizations promulgate?
- What other resources are there for best practices?
- Does it matter what kind of governance structure you have?
- What other options exist?

LEGAL, COPYRIGHT AND OWNERSHIP STANDARDS
- Deeds of trust
- Deeds of gift
- Donor contracts
- Due diligence for boards of trustees
- Accounting standards for the proceeds from collections sales

At the conclusion of the Symposium, a Deaccessioning Tool Kit will be developed to outline the guidelines institutions should follow when considering deaccessioning artifacts and works of art.

The Symposium is particularly recommended for staff and board members of collecting institutions.
